California Appellate Court Affirms Denial Of Class Certification

California Employment Law Blog on January 16, 2014

As we recently reported here, there have been a number of appellate decisions ordering class certification based on the existence of an employer's companywide policy – all while overlooking numerous individualized questions that would undoubtedly create manageability problems during trial. On December 30, 2013, the California Court of Appeal in Johnson v. California Pizza Kitchen,... Continue Reading
